Chapter 1 - The Mirror

1 - The Mirror

A girl stood, looking into the reflective surface of her mirror. What she saw was someone who was tired, but not only tired searching for something, she saw herself. She was not ugly, a few blemishes zits and such were there as they were on many adolescents, her eyes surrounded by dark black rings were brown like her hair and sunken. Her cheek bones, though not high enough to make her look high and mighty but around the middle were permanently pinkish, her nose was about the normal size also, some thought it cute. Her lips were pink as any others and full, but everytime she looked at her normal looking face she saw all the problems.

Her chin, when she looked at it was full of blackheads and ugly, fat surrounded it and swallowed up her neck, but most others thought nothing of it. When looking at her cheeks she thought them covered with zillions of zits pussing at those that looked at them and nasty, when in reality they were few and only red.

She rubbed her face, trying to push away the ugliness she saw when looking at herself and wondered how anyone could love someone like her. Because everytime she thought about herself, she only saw what was wrong.

She moved away from the mirror hugging her arms around her stomach, tired and wishing she was beautiful like those all around her, and nice and knew just what to say and when to say it, when she realized her foolish dreams she demolished them and curled up on the enormous couch sitting in the small living room.

She was swallowed by its enormous size and laughed as she sunk in deeply, but as soon as she heard her laugh she remembered a time when she had been teased about her laugh her sister had said it sounded like a horse dying, and tears grew in her eyes.

"I'm so ugly." she muttered letting herself sink in, she didn't want to be seen anymore, she just wanted to die.
