A distant wolf howled in the fading sunlight. The cry for hunt followed by others, his pack, and their howls apart where eerie glows but together were in harmony of quiet and peace. A middle aged glossy gray male wolf started off running towards his usual hunting grounds, following in his exact paw prints were his mate and pack. The lead male, Gray Howl, stopped suddenly and sniffed the chilly air, caribou were near, he started off once more and slowing his pace he hid in a small thicket of thorn bushes. There he could look out at his prey from an almost clear area; the large mountain was his only injustice. The caribou could easily swiftly turn the corner and he and his pack might never see the herd again. Thorns clasped at the packs fur making it harder to move without disturbing the caribou's keen vision. Soft Ear, a very young inexperienced male, tugged his coat loose creating a ripple through the brush, alerted the female and young male caribou started running at top speed away from the unknown adversary. The alpha male, Fierce Horn, held his antlers high, hesitating then running and making sure his herd was far from the danger. Gray Howl, giving a quick glance at Soft Ear, started running forward to the prey. Too late. The lead male was just turning the corner of the mountain. Gray Howl drooped his head for a quick second then repositioning it to its normal height he started off looking again, but letting his disappointment pass, at Soft Ear. Soft Ear felt embarrassed, he had let his pack down on only his first try but worst he had let Gray Howl down. He knew Gray Howl would let it pass by like he always did but Soft Ear couldn't pass this on as easily as his new leader. Soft Ear had let down to many and now he felt it was up to him to make up for those mistakes. As soon as the last of the pack had taken their place in line he followed onward devising how he should slip away without being noticed.
