Introduction It had been a regular day and Anne had just returned from her nursing job. That day she had, had some very unusual patients. All of the patients were just getting paler and paler, not only that but they were loosing blood rapidly and she could not find the source or cause or it. The strangest of all was that they al had a faint trace of a bite or scratch mark on them. But fortunately for her, her shift ended before she saw the worst of it. That night Anne could not sleep. She kept having horrific dreams about zombies and a winged demon wolf that was, for now, the bringer of Death. The next day Anne and her 18-year-old daughter, Katrina, went back to Anne's work, but strangely they found it empty. They wandered around looking for any sign of life but when they found it they wished they had not. All of the strange patients Anne had seen yesterday were acting even stranger and lifeless. All of the patients had skin the color of a thin cloud going over a full moon. They're eyes... oh they're horrible eyes. The eyeballs looked as if they were shoved a couple of inches deeper down in the eye socket. They're skin, aside from being a deathly pale color, was starting to rot away and you could almost see the maggots just below the surface of the skin. Katrina screamed and her and her mother fled for their lives, only to find all the exits blocked, except the skylight, which they were standing under. The patients, who had formed a circle around Katrina and Anne, were starting to tighten their circle. When there were only a couple of feet standing between them and the patients Katrina screamed again. At the last minute something broke through the skylight above Katrina and Anne, showering them with broken glass. As soon as the glass stopped falling Katrina shot her head up to see what it was that broke through and immediately she was frozen with awe. What had broken through was what looked like a giant wolf with wings. Katrina was first drawn to its eyes; they were almost identical to hers. They were both a chilling green with flecks of both red and gold going throughout them. The next thing she noticed about it was its color of its wings and fur. Both were a stunning midnight black, except that the tips of its ears and about the last half a foot of its tail were a brilliant and dazzling white. Her hair besides, the end tips and the first couple of strands that ran strait down the front of her face which were a brilliant white, was the same midnight black color as the creatures. Probably the most amazing thing about it though was its size. It could easily be the size of a common house. Its wings looked to be about three times that. What was strange though was that its claws, that was about four inches wide and as long as your arm glinted like newly polished metal. It let out a blood-curdling howl and all the patients flew back against the walls. It then shot down, grabbed Katrina and Anne, surprisingly gently for its size, around the waists and rocketed back through the obliterated skylight. It shot between buildings at an alarming rate until it came to the largest of them all where it gently set them down on its roof and then went off a again as quickly as it had come. It was a couple of hours before it returned again and this time it had more people. It was about to leave again when Katrina ran up to it and said, "who or what are you, and why did you save us?" It was silent for a moment before replying, "my name is Kinsuke and I am, if not the only one left, a demon winged wolf. And I saved you because it was you who awakened me," with that it dove down to the forest below.
