That question can feel big, but kids absorb more than we think. We went with surrogacy with full support, so we had access to child-focused counseling on how to share the story early on. Surmam <https://surmam.com/> suggested starting with something simple: “Some babies grow in their mommy’s tummy, and some grow in another special person’s tummy, but they’re all deeply loved.”

Hi! That question can feel big, but kids absorb more than we think. We went with surrogacy with full support, so we had access to child-focused counseling on how to share the story early on. Surmam <https://surmam.com/> suggested starting with something simple: "Some babies grow in their mommy's tummy, and some grow in another special person's tummy, but they're all deeply loved." We added pictures, books, and even kind words from our surrogate to help our child see it as a normal, beautiful part of their beginning. Keeping it open and positive helped them feel proud, not different.
